We are pleased with the Portfolio's progress this year, with returns well ahead of the benchmark. However, 2026 has been a notably tougher environment for local markets, with the FTSE/JSE All Share Index (ALSI) and FTSE/JSE All Bond Index returning -3.2% and 3.5% respectively, year to date. Recent market moves serve as a reminder that returns are unlikely to follow a straight line.

The weak performance of the ALSI this year is partly attributable to poor returns from many domestically focused companies. A number of businesses that previously traded at elevated valuations have seen significant declines in their share prices from the highs reached over the past few years. Examples include Foschini (-72%), WeBuyCars (-53%), Clicks (-48%) and AVI (-30%). Against this backdrop, we are increasingly finding attractive opportunities among South African companies trading at valuations well below historical levels and have selectively increased exposure to domestic businesses. At the same time, we continue to see considerable value in maintaining meaningful offshore diversification, given the wide range of possible economic and political outcomes.

While progress has been made on several domestic reform initiatives, given the scale of South Africa's challenges, improvements are likely to remain gradual. When investing in domestically focused businesses, we therefore do not assume a meaningful improvement in economic growth in the near term. Elevated oil prices have increased pressure on consumers and businesses, while the South African Reserve Bank (SARB) raised the repo rate to 7.25% in September, marking its second increase this year. Headline inflation remains above the upper end of the SARB's new 2-4% target range, making further interest rate increases likely. The upcoming local government elections on 4 November 2026 will be closely watched by investors as a test of confidence in the government of national unity's reform agenda. While political developments can affect market sentiment in the short term, we remain focused on identifying attractively valued investments rather than attempting to predict election outcomes.

A second factor behind the ALSI's weak return this year has been the decline in the gold price and the resulting weakness in precious metals shares. Despite its traditional role as a hedge during periods of uncertainty, gold ended the quarter at approximately US$4 200 per ounce, well below the peak of approximately US$5 400 per ounce reached earlier in the year. Much of that rally appears to have been driven by speculative buying during late 2025. This reinforces a point we frequently make: a good asset can still be a poor investment if purchased at too high a price. While we continue to recognise gold's diversification benefits and retain exposure to gold mining companies, we remain mindful of the risks associated with concentrated exposure to any single theme. With precious metals shares now representing about a quarter of the ALSI's weight, index concentration has reached levels that we view as excessive. This reinforces the importance of active stock selection.

Global markets experienced a challenging quarter but have remained remarkably strong throughout 2026. A notable feature has been the continued dominance of a relatively small group of companies associated with artificial intelligence (AI), while much of the broader market has delivered more modest returns. We remain sceptical that the enormous levels of investment currently being directed towards data centres will ultimately earn attractive economic returns and are cautious of areas where expectations and valuations appear overly optimistic. Our offshore holdings, managed primarily by Orbis, have nevertheless benefited from selected exposure to businesses supplying critical components and infrastructure to the AI ecosystem, which contributed positively to the Portfolio's performance.

At the beginning of the year, markets anticipated interest rate cuts from the US Federal Reserve (Fed). Instead, the Fed raised rates by 25 basis points in September and reiterated its commitment to returning inflation to its 2% target, suggesting that further tightening may be required to tame inflation. A significant market development this year has been the sharp rise in long-dated US government bond yields, with 30-year Treasury bonds ending the quarter at approximately 5.6% – the highest level since 2002. Concerns around inflation and the continued deterioration of the United States' fiscal position have been key drivers. For many years, the Portfolio has held very limited exposure to developed market government bonds, but yields have now reached levels where a case can increasingly be made for having some allocation.

This year has been characterised by rising geopolitical tension, higher interest rates and increasing market concentration. While these risks are different in nature, they all highlight the importance of portfolio resilience. Protecting capital in difficult environments remains a key focus of the Portfolio. Rather than positioning the portfolio for a single outcome, we continue to build a diversified portfolio designed to perform across a range of economic environments.

During the quarter, the Portfolio added to its existing positions in Boxer and Dis-Chem, while reducing its holdings in BHP and Glencore.
